TELESIS, LLC RECEIVES GOLD CQIA AWARD

September 1, 2010

EAST HARTFORD, CT –Telesis, LLC, one of the Northeast’s leading software testing companies, was awarded a gold innovation prize by the Connecticut Quality Improvement Award Partnership for its proprietary methodology, TARS (Telesis Automated Regression Solution).

TARS is the first complete platform for testing software applications. In eight to ten weeks, Telesis can design, configure, and build a turnkey automated regression test solution uniquely configured for each software application. The average return on investment with TARS is 89% in reduced testing time, with a 76% decrease in production defects. In announcing the prize, Sheila Carmine, founder and executive director of Connecticut Quality Improvement Award Partnership, stated, “Even in a faltering economy, Telesis has shown that forward looking organizations bring forth new products and services.”

The 23-year old Connecticut Quality Improvement Award (CQIA) is the nation’s first state level quality award using the Malcolm Baldrige National Quality Award for Performance Excellence criteria to advance innovation through improvements in quality, performance and marketplace competitiveness. CQIA’s Innovation Prize recognizes accomplishments during the first stages of the quality journey for Connecticut organizations. It is meant to stimulate interest in organizations to implement quality, while fostering recognition of innovative improvements. This year, 16 Connecticut companies received gold awards, including Yale University and Nestle.

According to Patty Sue Williams, the president of Telesis, “We are proud that the CQIA Partnership has recognized what our clients have been telling us for some time. The TARS platform has saved them time and money, by shortening their testing periods and greatly improving the quality of their software products.”
